General Questions

What is the significance of selling peanut-free candy bars?

Food allergies are very common, and we're all becoming more aware of the significance of severe allergic reactions and the potential life-threatening risks. In response to the problems associated with peanut and nut allergies, school districts across the country are starting to enforce peanut-free policies. People who are allergic to peanuts should avoid foods that contain peanut and peanut byproducts. This includes anything with a warning that it "may contain" or "may contain traces of" peanut. Only companies with products that are labeled "peanut free" can claim their products have been manufactured and packaged in a peanut-free facility.

What is your process for making your candy bars in a peanut-free environment?

All products containing our peanut-free logo are manufactured in a peanut-free zone. This area is completely closed off from the rest of the plant, and restricted to authorized personnel only. Samples of each production lot are examined for traces of peanuts.

Ingredients arrive sealed through a common receiving area until they're transported to the zone that will convert them. Likewise, the finished product is stocked in a common shipping area but before leaving the peanut-free zone, the peanut-free candy bars are sealed with wrappers around the bars, and placed in carrying cases that are also factory-sealed.

The peanut-free zone uses its own manufacturing equipment; which isn't used for any other production process. Only peanut-free zone employees work in that zone; they are never transferred to the regular factory nor do they have access to it. They arrive in their normal street clothes, change into their work clothes and shoes, and

Our supplier is peanut-free certified and is regularly inspected by government agencies. They don't claim "nut-free" on their candy bars because they produce roasted almond chocolate bars. Though no one can claim zero risk of cross-contamination, our supplier feels it's well-controlled until the product is received by our customers.
